It's the city's story for all to read

PHOTOS BY PAUL BROWN

Central Mayor Mac Martin is joined by Beverly Cureton and Anne Sheriff in unveiling the city's new historical marker.

Central gets reminder of its place in history

Two-sided marker erected downtown gives overview of community's past

STAFF REPORTS

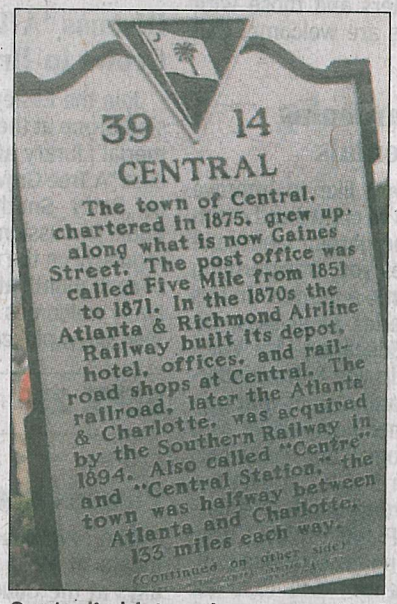

City officials and local historians participated last week in the unveiling of a historical marker for the city of Central.

The sign is located at the corner of Main and Bank streets in downtown Central.

It includes information about Central's charter, its past as a railroading center, as well as the history of the Issaqueena Cotton Mill and Southern Wesleyan University.

Attending the unveiling were Central Mayor Mac Martin, state Sen. Larry Martin, Beverly Cureton of the Central Heritage Society, Anne Sheriff, volunteer curator for the Faith Clayton Family Research Center at Southern Wesleyan and Central Administrator Phillip Mishoe.

The marker was erected by the Central Heritage Society and the city of Central.

Central's history is summarized on the two sides of the downtown's new historical marker.