

Clemson University's Littlejohn Coliseum has been upgraded to include new fan seating, larger video boards, new concessions and ribbon board displays. (Photo/Provided)

Clemson officials unveil Littlejohn Coliseum upgrades

Calling the $63.5 million in renovations "an exciting step for the future of our basketball programs," Dan Radakovich, Clemson University's director of athletics, capped off the opening of the newly-renovated Littlejohn Coliseum this month.

The facility has undergone renovations to include a technology overhaul and new training amenities along with the installation of new larger video boards, new concessions, a practice court, new locker rooms and coaches offices.

"Our desire was to update Littlejohn but respect the great structure that has served our university so well for almost 50 years. We are very proud of the results—fans, alumni, students and student-athletes will feel like they are walking into a new building," Radakovich said, in a news release commemorating the opening.

According to AECOM and LS3P, the designer and architects on the project, the decision to rotate the existing seating inside the coliseum "created new seating options and capitalized on previously underutilized back-of-house space." The upgrades include three shooting courts, locker room lounge, film room, a 6,000-square-foot weight training and athletic medicine suite as well as team suites for both the men's and women's basketball programs.

Inside the numbers

$63.5 million
The cost of the upgrades to Clemson University's Littlejohn Coliseum

1,100
The number of fans added to student seating behind the visiting team's second half basket

6,000
The square footage added for a new weight training and athletic medicine suite

3
The number of new shooting courts added to Littlejohn Coliseum