Snow return?

Weather systems could bring more this week

BY CHRISTINA CLEVELAND
THE JOURNAL

SENECA — Some Oconee County residents didn't see much or any of it over the weekend, but local meteorologists called for an 80 to 90 percent chance of snow Monday night and into this morning.

Greer-based National Weather Service meteorologist Scott Krentz said Monday a few systems bringing in snow were headed to the Oconee area this week. The first was expected Monday night.

Krentz said Monday that precipitation was moving in from the southwest and predicted it would start off as rain, switching over around midnight to snow, which would continue through mid-morning today.

Snowfall amounts

SEE SNOW, PAGE A5

SNOW: 'You could get two to three inches'

FROM PAGE A1

for the area were predicted to be around an inch.

"It's cold enough it's going to stick to the roads," Krentz said. "There could be some road issues around daybreak Tuesday and mid-morning."

Krentz said temperatures were expected to remain at 30 degrees overnight and stay below freezing until 11 a.m. or noon today, with a high of 38 degrees this afternoon.

Another system that is also expected to bring wintry precipitation is expected to move up the Carolina coast Wednesday afternoon, according to Krentz.

He called for rain starting early afternoon Wednesday that would change to snow around sunset and continue until around daybreak.

"With that (system), we're still working on the amounts, but you could get two to three inches by Thursday morning," he said.

Krentz said there is a 70 to 80 percent chance of snow Wednesday night. Temperatures are expected to be in the mid-40s on Thursday.

christina@upstatetoday.com | (864) 973-6681

Microsoft Office Home and Business Delivery Order#: ITD-240770
Tel: 877-780-6040